

Ray C. Battalio Fellow Award 2017

Every year, the Ray C. Battalio Award is granted to an outstanding doctoral student in behavioral economics. The award and provides them with funding to support the costs of conducting experimental research. We am very pleased to announce that the 2017 Ray C. Battalo Fellow is Noah Bacine.

Noah is a fifth-year doctoral student in behavioral economics. His research focuses primarily on identity, especially as it relates to gender and race, and how this affects individuals' economic decision-making. He has been very active in mentoring undergraduate research groups, and has coauthored two papers with his students.

Congratulations Noah!

We look forward to seeing the research that will be conducted as a result of this fellowship.
